A guide to engaging with MPs

evangelical alliance together making Jesus known

The Evangelical Alliance longs to see Christians engaging with their public representatives in a productive and encouraging way...

... but we recognise that sometimes it can be difficult to know where to start. We hope that this resource will help you begin to build relationships with your MPs and encourage you to pray for and support them as they represent you. You will find a choice of ways to get in touch with your MP and the most effective way to engage with them on matters that you care about.

The past four years have been a challenging time for communities across the UK and for British politics. The legacy of the COVID pandemic continues to deeply impact local communities and recent violent civil unrest following the general election shows a growing trend of distrust between communities and politics. Now is an opportune time for Christians and church leaders to share biblical truths about good governance and encourage our elected leaders to value the vital contribution of churches to local communities and the gospel to public life. The political crises our country faces need evangelicals to become active citizens who engage with their political representatives in a way that fosters trust and partnership as well as shares the hope that we have in Jesus.

We believe that the church has all the infrastructures and structures in place to be at the grassroots of rebuilding lives and communities as we navigate the years ahead. We have the human resources and by the power of the Spirit, the heart to love and serve. We have unique relational networks and by following the example of Jesus, we know how to care for the isolated, the vulnerable, and the broken. At this time, connecting with our MPs could both be an opportunity for the gospel, as well as a chance for Christians in your area to be known as people of sacrificial love.

Why should we engage with our MPs?

Our voices matter

Everyone has a worldview shaped by beliefs, attitudes and experiences. Christians in the UK hold a worldview that is shaped by the authority of the Bible. In modern society we hear many different voices and views, some of which stand at odds with our biblical perspective. We may feel intimidated or irrelevant in conversations about how society should function and the rules that govern our nation.

However, there are approximately 2 million evangelical Christians in the UK and as a significant group we should understand that our voices matters in how our nation is governed. Instead of passively allowing other voices and worldviews to shape our national values and laws, we can all be positive active citizens in conversations about issues that matter to us.

The Bible instructs us to respect people in authority

Romans 13:1 says, “Let everyone be subject to the governing authorities, for there is no authority except that which God has established.”

What better reason to connect with our elected representatives than to put God’s word into action by giving respect to their leadership role and office.

The Bible instructs us to love people who differ from us

Mark 12:31 commands that we “love our neighbours”, including those from whom we differ. While Jesus talks of people of different religious backgrounds being our neighbours, those of different political persuasions are our neighbours too.

As Christians we are called to seek the welfare of the city

Jeremiah 29:7 instructs us to seek the peace and prosperity of the city wherever we live. Surely this is a call to activities and conversations that make life better for all in our society.

As Christians we are called to stand out by our actions

1 Peter 2:12 says “Live such good lives among the pagans that, though they accuse you of doing wrong, they may see your good deeds and glorify God on the day he visits us”.

Living ‘good’ lives and treating our public representatives with love and respect could lead to people coming to know Jesus for themselves. It might be helpful to mentally frame our engagement in this way. As you reach out with kindness and encouragement, your MP may ask why you treat them this way. Have an answer prepared that points them to Jesus. You can tell them about Jesus, the one who sacrificed everything in order to reach out to us.

Don't forget: God wants to see all people saved, including our public representatives. Let's reach out to them and show them what good news looks and feels like.

How to get started

To be politically engaged, we don't necessarily have to join a political party, start a campaign group or march in protest rallies. One of the simplest ways to be actively engaged in public debate is to connect with your local public representatives.

As children of God we should engage with our public representatives to show them gratitude for their service, praise them when they do something well and get to know them as people, not just politicians. When our public representative knows us as people marked by respect and love, they will hear us when we offer an alternative perspective.

We believe that one of the greatest ways to show support to our representatives is by praying for them regularly and with them when possible, as 1 Timothy 2:1–4 commands:

“I urge, then, first of all, that petitions, prayers, intercession and thanksgiving be made for all people – for kings and all those in authority, that we may live peaceful and quiet lives in all godliness and holiness. This is good, and pleases God our Saviour, who wants all people to be saved and to come to a knowledge of the truth.”

So, before you begin, take a moment to pray for your public representatives. Then read on and start the journey to getting to know how to engage better with your public representatives.

What are the different kinds of public representatives in the UK?

Councillors

There are around 382 local councils across the UK and some further 10,000 local councils including town, parish, community neighbourhood and village councils. Local Councils are responsible for a range of services and include education, housing, transport, social services, waste management, registration of births, deaths and marriages. This is not an exhaustive list. You can find out who your local councillors are, here: www.electoralcommission.org.uk/resources/resources-young-people/who-responsible/local-councils

MPs

At each general election the public votes to elect Members of Parliament (MPs) to represent their interests and concerns in the House of Commons. In the 2024 General Election 650 MPs were elected, where the Labour Party received the most votes and able to form a Government. You can find out who your local MP is and voting records here: members.parliament.uk/members/commons

Combined Authorities

Combined Authorities (CA) are legally constituted under national legislation and bring together a group of two or more councils to make collective decisions across council boundaries. At present there are ten combined authorities all located within the England. Watch a 60-second video explaining CA here: youtu.be/HtzL12d2eGk?si=yvi2e9YOWC_TpSyQ

National representatives

Through national legislation, the UK Parliament devolved power away from Westminster to three nations and further devolution across England. Back in 1998 the then government devolved some legislative and executive powers to Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland by establishing the Scottish Parliament, the Senedd and Northern Ireland Assembly respectively. Who should I contact?

In the first instance we would encourage you to connect with your local councillor to discuss issues regarding local services, facilities and planning.

On issues of education, health and justice we would encourage you to email or send a letter to your elected MPs where they and their team are willing to listen and learn about your concerns and raise them in a debate in the House of Commons or with the appropriate government minister.

Sometimes it is worth checking to see which select committee your MP is elected to or which all-party parliamentary group your MP has registered an interest to build rapport and learn if they have interest on the issue you raise. You can connect with MPs that are not your elected representative, but as you are not their constituent they are unlikely to respond to local issues raised.

writetothem.com is a helpful website that makes emailing your representatives easy. You can also check your public representative's website or social media accounts for the date, time and venue of their constituency surgeries. These are times when you can drop in to see your public representative without having to make an appointment.

How do I connect with my public representative?

Your public representatives are ordinary people, so there is no need to be anxious to approach them. Start by introducing yourself; councillors and MPs want to get to know their constituents. You can mention your job, the church you go to, and the community projects with which you are involved.

It is important to contact public representatives regardless of what party they belong to. By engaging with councillors MPs from across the political spectrum you can have a wider conversation and get a full perspective of the issue from a variety of angles. You may be surprised by where you find common ground and support for your issue!

As a Christian, you can be distinctive in the way you approach your public representative by making sure you communicate a positive message in your conversation, something that will encourage them, before you go on to voice any opinions or complaints that you might have. This small gesture will speak volumes about the difference being a follower of Jesus makes.

Some questions to consider in any interaction that you have with your public representative, whether that be online or in person are:

- Is what I am saying constructive?
- Would I speak to a friend the way I speak to my public representative?
- Is this how I want Christians to be perceived?
- Am I representing my church well?

How can you support your public representatives practically?

Pray for them

Begin to support your public representatives by bringing them before God's throne of grace. In addition to your personal prayers, you could encourage your church leaders to include public representatives in your church's regular prayer rota.

Email them

It's good to be in regular contact with your public representatives and sending an email is the easiest way to do so. Practice the habit of sending an email to your public representative to encourage them, not only when you have a complaint or concern. You could let your public representative know that you are praying for them, and ask for specific prayer points to share with your church. You may be surprised by how much your public representative appreciates this.

Send them a card

A letter or card can be used to encourage your public representative, and unlike an email it is more likely to be remembered. Lots of public representatives put cards up in their office as reminders of the support and encouragement they receive from their constituents.

Visit them

The best way to get to know your public representative personally, and for them to get to know and trust you, is to meet with them face to face. Don't be intimidated by this approach; after all, your public representative is an ordinary person.

Take them a gift

Being a public representative is stressful, and the overtime and community work that public representatives do can often go underappreciated. So, why not give your public representative some baked goods or a small gift, to show your appreciation for the effort they are making?

Invite them to church

By inviting a public representative to your church, you're showing them that they, like anybody, are a welcomed and valued member of your community. You could invite them to a special service, such as at Christmas or Easter, or perhaps a church anniversary. But, don't just limit invitations to special days; invite your public representative to be part of your church and help them to witness the value that the church adds to their constituents' lives.
